Intended / Actual movement

The tricorn beneath this Endeavour

- That, in an ideology-driven ^{mission} ~~movement~~, movement is inhibited by the hero's tendency to assume that their ~~good~~ end is possible, and their means are sufficient. If the hero could refine the end, in such a way that the means could be maximized, this inhibition could be overcome?

- If the end is taken to be fixed, the only element able to be altered / then being the means, the movement towards the end is likely inhibited and improvable / optimizable.

try again...

If the means are taken toward a certain end, the mere direction of the means, the intention therein - does not necessarily determine the effect generated by such movement. That said, the effect generated by a means worked toward a certain end is not necessarily the most efficient ^{route} ~~means~~ to that end. → perhaps the certain end. could be more efficiently/economically/quickly be accomplished by the movement generated by the means to a different end. How, then, does one convince oneself to abandon the certain ~~more~~ initial end in favor of the different complementary end? How does one even determine what this new end would be, to say nothing of how to believe in it?

Intended movement	Actual movement
- the means posited as the route to be taken to the ~~initial~~ end.	- the effect(s) generated by the hero and altered indefinitely by forces external to the hero
